

I am completely satisfied with the Indiana No Call telemarketing list. It has helped cut down on the incredible invasion of privacy, primarily perpetrated by the bank credit card companies.

In my experience, the banks and credit card companies use the “existing relationship” loopholes simply to harass people who have fallen behind on credit card payments.

In my situation, I have received up to 13 calls a day, including as early as 7:30 am on a Sunday morning, to 9:30PM on a Saturday night regarding credit cards for which I have no liability.

I doesn't matter that I have written letters to the credit card companies, that I inform the callers that they are calling the wrong number, or give them information that would correct their errors. They continue to call.

The current Indiana Law has improved the situation, even though the law could be strengthened to be even better. To consider weakening it would be a disaster for the population of the United States.

The Banks and credit card companies are clearly and intentionally pursuing predatory and intimidating tactics with the American population, and are asking the FCC's assistance to not only maintain their tactics, but to intensify their tactics.
